

The author is an Assistant Professor at ANONYMIZED, School of Information. She uses digital tools to study language related to sex, gender and sexuality. She did her doctoral training in English at ANONYMIZED, during which she taught herself how to program. She experiments with methods like text analysis and machine learning, and most recently, Large Language Models to study discourses of transphobia in the US. In her research, she strives to work across disciplinary divides, publishing her writing in both Humanities and Computer Science venues. Her coding projects and teaching materials are published on her github profile, under ANONYMIZED.